Executive functioning skills are vital for young learners, as they lay the groundwork for academic success and personal growth.

Skills like planning, organization, time management, and self-regulation help children navigate daily tasks and challenges, fostering resilience and independence. Parents are encouraged to attend our Parent University on executive functioning to understand how these skills impact their children's development and to gain practical strategies for support at home. By working together, we can equip our children with the essential tools they need to thrive in school and beyond.

Tech Tip

Our school Bingo night was a blast! It was fantastic to see families sharing some classic fun together and taking a break from screen time. Digital fatigue can sneak up on us in funny ways. If you notice you are trying to put a password into your microwave, try scheduling regular screen breaks for you and your family. By designating specific times as device-free, families can dive into activities like outdoor play, board games, or cooking together, which fosters stronger relationships and healthier habits. These breaks also help reduce the negative impacts of excessive screen time, such as eye strain and disrupted sleep patterns. So, let's up our family engagement, decrease evening screen time, and give our eyes and brain the rest they need for a quality night's sleep.
